Digital campaign highlights job opportunities in the sugar manufacturing sector

The Australian Sugar Milling Council (ASMC) has launched a new digital campaign to coincide with the start of the annual sugarcane crushing season in Queensland, highlighting the training and apprenticeship opportunities available throughout regional Queensland and the sugar milling industry's significant economic and social contributions to the state.

The campaign includes a series of videos and profiles featuring eight apprentices from Queensland sugar mills, including Tully Sugar, Wilmar Sugar's Victoria Mill (Ingham) and Pioneer Mill (Brandon), Mackay Sugar, and Isis Sugar (Bundaberg Region).

ASMC Chief Executive Officer Rachele Sheard said the sugar manufacturing industry is the lifeblood of many regional communities along the Queensland coastline, supporting over 19,000 jobs and injecting close to $3.8 billion directly and indirectly into the state economy.

"The sugar milling sector is part of the economic fabric of regional Queensland communities and offers attractive and skilled career pathways," Ms Sheard said.

"This campaign puts a face to our apprentices and highlights the important role the mills play in providing training and career opportunities, financial security and a great lifestyle in regional Queensland."

Jorja Grabs, a first-year fitter and turner apprentice at Wilmar Sugar's Pioneer Mill in Brandon, said she was inspired by her older sister who is an electrical apprentice at the mill and is looking forward to playing a role in the upcoming crush season.

"I see this to be a great career opportunity as I have always had an interest in fitting and turning," she said.

"Something that definitely makes me proud working for the mill is after you have finished your jobs in the workshop, getting to see those put into the mill and just to know that you have helped out to make everything run and for everything to go forward for the crush season."

Fitter and turner Alex Miskin is a third-generation employee at Tully Sugar, who completed his apprenticeship in December 2022.

"My grandfather was one of the head draftsmen and my father is a carpenter and concreter here. I wanted to follow behind them and work in the sugar mill, and being able to do my apprenticeship at Tully Sugar gave me good grounds for higher learning," he said.

The Sugar Milling Apprentice campaign will be promoted through social media, industry events and partnerships. Ms Sheard said she hopes the campaign will help raise awareness of the important role the sugar milling industry plays in Queensland's economy and inspire more young people to pursue apprenticeships in the industry.

“Having diversified sources of employment and investment has never been more important for our regional communities, who without the agriculture sector, would have been severely impacted during the pandemic.

“Not only do our sugar mills offer rewarding career pathways and financial security to regional Queenslanders and their communities locally, but we are a progressive, future-focused sector that will make a significant contribution to our state’s renewable energy agenda over the next decade.”

Minister for Skills and Training, Brendan O’Connor, endorsed the Sugar Milling Apprenticeship campaign, highlighting the importance of securing the next generation of skilled workers.

“The sugarcane industry is so important for Australia, and we need the next generation of skilled workers to support it into the future,” he said.

“An apprenticeship in the sugar sector can lead to a rewarding, secure and well-paid job in a vital Australian industry.”
